

"I'M AN ARTIST. I'M A FIGHTER!"

Lyne Lapointe is an evolution

Words Chris Hartman
Photography Caleb Dudley

This page: Memory, '22. Opposite page: Lapointe in her studio with Scapegoat, '22.

Lyne Lapointe has always been resilient in forging her own path. When she was 12 years old, there was a little house behind her parents' big country home in Montreal. She calls it her hiding place. There, she would make her "little paintings" and then burn them in the fireplace — clearly her mother wasn't very approving of her artistic inclinations.

A recent exhibition, Stressed World, at The School in Kinderhook, New York, featured Lapointe's paintings of the human form, exhibited in a salon manner. Her figures represent some form of distortion, and display various objects inserted in their bodies. As she notes, it's all about how she sees the body — its transformation, its spirit, and what it reflects; in other words, how you see someone else. "We all have our own realities," she says. She then adds in witnessing the suffering of women around the world, her empathy and emotions led her to become more connected to them, and her exhibition at The School is an outgrowth of how increasingly emotionally connected Lapointe feels she is to her subjects.

These solitary, mainly female painted figures, were festooned with glass dolls' eyes, sewing pins, and children's blocks, all encased in wooden or painted frames. They are reminiscent of folk art, in which many of the objects are broken — seemingly a representation of Lapointe's own broken bodily experiences during her infirmities.

One of her works from the Anti / Body 2021 exhibition at the Jack Shainman Gallery in New York City, Jeune fille avec une corde à sauter (Young girl with a skipping rope), reveals the rope as a loop of barbed wire. As Lapointe explains, "It's about war," and symbolic of how many people around the world are oppressed in the shadows of war. The barbed wire, she adds, represents a fence that constrains your movement and your freedom, and which renders you, in many ways, indentured.

Along with Martha Fleming, her most important collaborator (1982–1995), Lapointe created several on-site urban installations. A recurring theme was architecture as a social determinant of space. Typically, their collaborations were rooted in the politics of feminism, gay and lesbian themes, marginalization, and museum practices and were a combination of art historical references, female sexuality and desire, and botany. Their main objective with these projects was to critically analyze social politics — in such cities as Montreal, New York City and São Paulo.

As with most artists, Lapointe's work has evolved into several periods and phases, but in her case an accident, and later cancer, transformed the manner in which she approached and/or created her art. One year, when she was living in an old firehouse in Montreal, where she had her studio, a fellow artist and friend arrived in a U-Haul to store some things with Lapointe while he moved to the city. As Lapointe went into the U-Haul, a brick wall of a nearby building fell on the truck — nearly crushing her. As a consequence, she spent a year convalescing. So much for her pipeline of anticipated projects — including a big one she had planned with Fleming in Tijuana, Mexico.

Consequently, Lapointe changed her way of working. She was traumatized by the accident to where she went to a psychologist, who advised her to move to the countryside and recuperate surrounded by nature. There, little by little, she returned to working — and her new body of work, a series of paintings, drawings and collages, was called The Blind Spot. As she says, "A blind spot is something that's there that you don't see" and was, in a way, symbolic of her accident and convalescence over the preceding year. The following year, 2002, she had a solo show of The Blind Spot at the Museum of Contemporary Art in Montreal.

After later being treated for cancer, Lapointe realized she could no longer physically handle the large-format wood carvings she was doing at the time, and so she once again decided to change her practice. She settled on etching on glass as well as printmaking and painting. As she remarked, the through line with each of the different varieties of art she pursued following her physical challenges, "I'm an artist. And I'm a fighter. Because I was squeezed [in the U-Haul], am I going to give up my art? I found another way to do it."

These days, Lapointe continues to live in the bucolic Canadian countryside. Here, she loves to walk in nature around her home, which gives her inspiration and direction. As to her work regimen, Lapointe is in the studio seven days a week. She says she never knows what is going to happen once she starts a project. Some days, she does more research in books and on the internet; while on other days, she needs to take a walk to reflect and figure out ways to materialize her ideas.

Can art save the world? Lapointe thinks that monied interests have disproportionate power and influence throughout the left: Young girl with a skipping rope, '20. Right: The Apple, Egg and Ginseng, '18, and Color Spectrum, '18.

Opposite page,
This page: Bulls Peace, '22.

world these days and is insistent that we must come together and communicate — including artists; though she insists that people of all professions, such as doctors, scientists and even taxi drivers, can help in this way to bring about change for combatting the world's problems and their perpetrators.

In 2012, at Jack Shainman's New York City gallery, seven of her paintings, La Pierre Patiente (The Patient Stone), invoked the following description of this magical stone from the Iranian-American novelist Azar Nafisi — who inspires Lapointe greatly.

"A term in Persian, 'the patient stone' ... is used in times of anxiety and turbulence. Supposedly, a person pours out all his troubles and woes into the stone. It will listen and absorb his pains and secrets, and this way he will be cured. Sometimes the stone can no longer endure its burdens and then it bursts."

The seven paintings of La Pierre Patiente interplay light, darkness and memory, supplemented by phosphorescent pigments. They summon the imagery of disembodiment, breakage and fragility. And, when describing the series, the Pierre-François Ouellette Art Contemporain in Montreal invoked a concept Lapointe cherishes: "metamorphosis." When you consider the physical and emotional challenges Lyne Lapointe has endured and surmounted over the years, no term could possibly be more symbolic of her evolution as an artist, and a woman. □

Lyne Lapointe is represented by jackshainman.com / Chris Hartman is a regular contributor to UD. @book_builder / Caleb Dudley is based in Brooklyn, NY. calebjudley.com and @caleb_dudley

In Lyne Lapointe's workshop

The resilient

PHOTO MARTIN TREMBLAY, THE PRESS

In her studio, Lyne Lapointe affixes gold leaf to her work The Tears of Gold.

After an exhibition at her New York gallery owner Jack Shainman and the screening at the International Art Film Festival of a documentary dedicated to her and which will be released in the fall, Lyne Lapointe is part, until November, of an exhibition during the ^{Venice} 60th Biennale. Resilient, the 66-year-old feminist artist continues her journey with passion. We met her in her workshop in Mansonville, in Estrie.

Updated May 18

ERIC CLEMENT

The Press

Mansonville

PHOTO MARTIN TREMBLAY, THE PRESS

Lyne Lapointe's house-workshop

In 1996, Lyne Lapointe and her friend (the painter) Pierre Dorion were seriously injured by a brick wall that broke away from the Montreal building that housed her studio. A few weeks later, following the advice of her doctor, she left with her partner Nancy Marcotte to rest in the countryside. Loving Estrie, the couple ended up acquiring a property in Mansonville in 2000. Fifteen acres of land on the edge of a hill. A frog pond, a small lake, a vegetable garden, a pine forest. And a workshop in a large rustic house studded with his works.

PHOTO MARTIN TREMBLAY, THE PRESS

Lyne Lapointe in her pine forest

The workshop is a veritable cabinet of curiosities. We discover her recent works, objects that she collects and uses for her creations and dozens of prints of engravings on glass or wood. We immediately recognize her recurring and sensitive treatment of the female body which she combines with her interests in nature and history.

PHOTO MARTIN TREMBLAY, THE PRESS

Lyne Lapointe's reservoir of impressions

● ●

Here, a painting on which the figurine of a Russian astronaut is attached was created on a hemp mosquito net that she brought from Japan. This is Ukrainian linen. Works for which she makes the wooden frames herself. When we passed by, she was pasting cultured pearls on paper to evoke a woman's clothing. A seated job, adapted to his current state of health, his legs hurting since the accident in 1996.

Resilience

Lyne Lapointe grew up in Hochelaga in a “rock’n’roll” family. His father, a manic depressive, ended his life. “It was quite painful when I was young,” she says. She then experienced many difficulties (the accident in 1996, cancer then complications), which she overcame with combativeness. His friendships, his loves, his encounters were his nourishing strength.

Her youth had already made her a determined and curious woman. And an artist. Because her father, imaginative and resourceful, and her mother, skilled with her hands, awakened in her the desire to create and an attraction to materials. At 12, she carved panels, painted them in oil and set them on fire to see the effect! In seventh grade, she had Monique Hurtubise as a teacher. Jacques Hurtubise's wife recognized the artist in her and advised him to study at the University of Ottawa where he taught. Lyne Lapointe therefore left Montreal for Ottawa at the age of 18, against the advice of her parents. "A question of survival," she said.

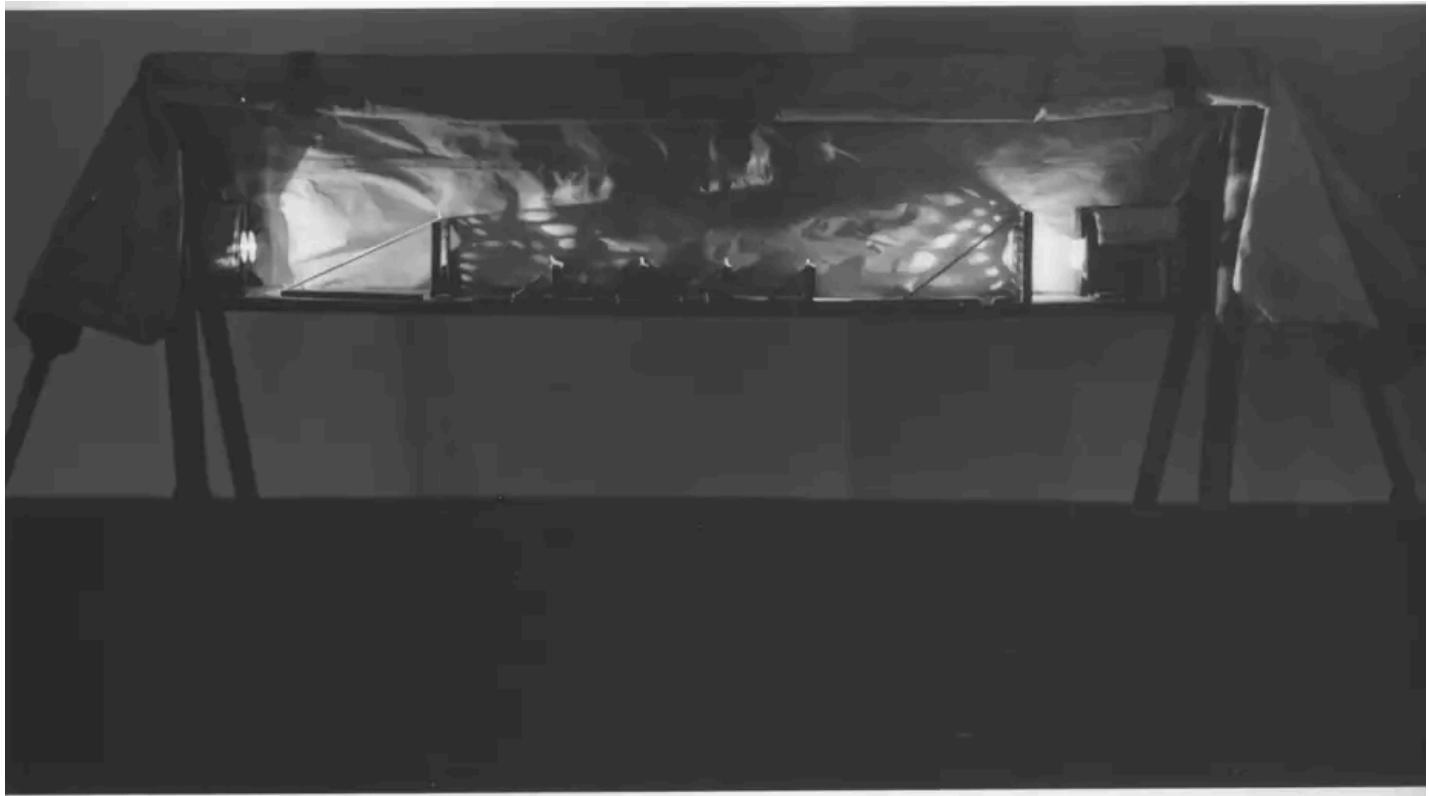

PHOTO PROVIDED BY LYNE LAPOINTE

One of his first installations, in 1980

Loving sculpting with heterogeneous materials, she shocked Jacques Hurtubise with a creation of paper and horsehair. "The effect was so special that he said: "Tab... what's the matter? It's scary!" » Influenced by architect Gordon Matta-Clark, she also became interested in abandoned buildings. The artist Betty Goodwin noticed her in 1977 and allowed her to exhibit in 1981 at her gallery owner, France Morin. Then begins a frenzy of creations...

Unclassifiable

With her signature imbued with feminism, sapphic love and her interests in knowledge and nature, Lyne Lapointe has always had an original reading of art. From 1981, she formed a unique duo of lesbian visual artists with Toronto art critic Martha Fleming for 15 years.

PHOTO PROVIDED BY LYNE LAPOINTE

View of the exhibition in the former Corona Theater

Their rejection of the traditional art market led them to successively create three installations in abandoned buildings in Montreal. In 1983, in a former fire station on rue Saint-Dominique. In 1984, their Science Museum exhibition was held in the current building of the 1700 art center, La Poste. And in 1987, La Donna Delinquenta, an exhibition on marginalized women, was organized in the former Corona Theater, then dilapidated, thanks to the intervention of La Poune's granddaughter, Kathleen Verdon.

PHOTO PROVIDED BY MAC

Untitled, 1983-1987, acquired by collector Pierre Bourgie after the exhibition at the Théâtre Corona, then given to the MAC

These exhibitions, which helped to save buildings in danger, combined painting and sculpture. They were successful and allowed the tandem to become known in the United States. This led him, in 1990, after exhibiting at the New Museum of Contemporary Art in New York, to create an exhibition at the Battery Maritime Building in New York, particularly on the arrival of black slaves in the 18th century. An exhibition that local black communities loved.

PHOTO PROVIDED BY THE ARTIST

View of a work by the duo outside the Battery Maritime Building

The exhibitions will follow one another, at the Museum of Contemporary Art in Montreal (1992), then at the 22nd Biennale of São Paulo, in 1994. After his separation from Martha Fleming, a retrospective of the duo's work is presented at the MAC in 1998 (Studio), then Lyne Lapointe exhibited The blind spot at the same place in 2002, before a museum exhibition in France in 2004. Since then, she has exhibited regularly at the Bellemare-Lambert gallery, in Montreal, and at her New York gallery owner .

 Visit the artist's page on the Jack Shainman gallery website

PHOTO MARTIN TREMBLAY, THE PRESS

Lyne Lapointe at her home in Mansonville, in Estrie

News

Last winter, Lyne Lapointe exhibited in New York. Echoes of Circumstance featured his work, that of Ghanaian sculptor El Anatsui and that of Hawaiian artist Garnet Puett. An American curator, Destinee Ross-Sutton, then purchased his work Madre del Mar. Chosen to curate an exhibition of 33 women artists from around the world who address female sexuality, Ms. ^{Ross} Sutton has included the work in this exhibition presented at the European Cultural Center at Palazzo Bembo, in Venice, until November 24.

Quite an honor for Lyne Lapointe!

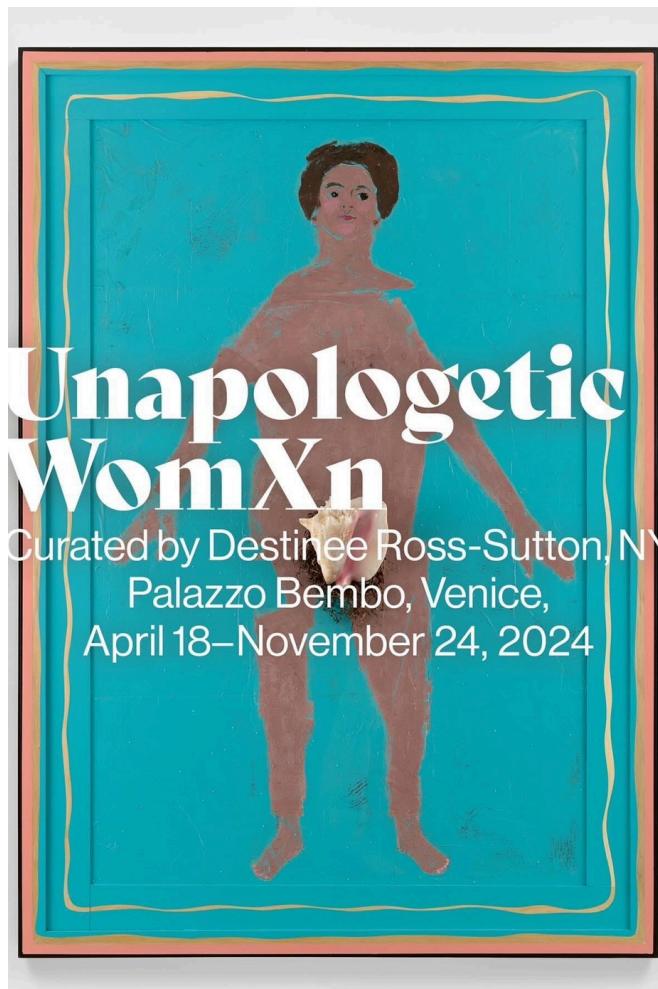

PHOTO PROVIDED BY LYNE LAPONTE

Madre Del Mar was selected for the poster of the exhibition in Venice.

The only Canadian artist in the group, she rubs shoulders with big names like Zanelia Muholi, Renee Cox and Vanessa German.

« It's cool. People feel in my work what the woman represents. The woman is strong. But we are not out of the woods! If I kiss Nancy in a store, it might still go hiiiii! As a lesbian and a woman, we have a different perception of the world and we continue to be marginalized and feel threatened. »

— Lyne Lapointe

PHOTO PROVIDED BY LYNE LAPOINTE

Work from the series The Patient Stone acquired by Glenn D. Lowry

In the documentary Art and Matter that Germán Gutiérrez and Carmen García dedicated to her, praise from the art world for Lyne Lapointe rains down. According to Glenn D. Lowry, director of the Museum of Modern Art in New York, “she does extraordinary and remarkable work.” Her gallery owner, Jack Shainman, believes that she is “one of the great artists of our time”. However, she never received a major award. “She is a free artist who does not compromise,” says Richard Gagnier, head of restoration at the Montreal Museum of Fine Arts. “Being a rebel is a position and also a destiny,” adds Diana Nemiroff, former curator at the National Gallery of Canada.

 Consult the artist's page on the Bellemare-Lambert galleries website

In images, in pictures

Here are some works by Lyne Lapointe over the years.

PHOTO PROVIDED BY MNBAQ

Cabinets of curiosities (Bruxa, The brain and The journey), Martha Fleming and Lyne Lapointe, 1990-1994. MNBAQ Collection

REVIEWS

Martha Fleming and Lyne LaPointe

By PATRICIA C. PHILLIPS

A repository of vague memories and unrelated activities, the still majestic Battery Maritime Building not only provides offices for several New York City agencies, housing for stray cats, and a berth for the Governor's Island Ferry, it serves as the site for Martha Fleming and Lyne LaPointe's month-long installation entitled The Wilds and the Deep.

The anxious process of describing and categorizing the past is the central theme of the installation; in response to the active but deteriorated building and the nautical and social history of the harbor location, the artists explore the complex and seldom disinterested practices of classification, and the alterability of the relic.

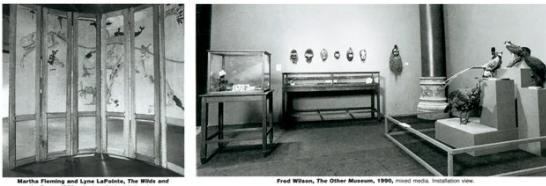

Fleming and LaPointe's interventions were modest, fleeting, almost ethereal; they chose to quietly exploit events rather than aggressively dominate the space. They did not battle the building with art of size and scale, instead Fleming and LaPointe scattered miscellanea collected over the years—paintings, drawings, plantings, inscriptions, small cabinets, and screens—around the site. They also incorporated relics found on the site; an old chair from the Ellis Island immigration center figured prominently in various vignettes on the second level of the building. A wrinkled, petrified rat was suspended in a halo of air framed by a cut in a green sail fastened to a wall.

The artists embraced both the building's uncompromised structural system and its infirmities caused by age and exposure. The green metal elevations facing the water are discolored and misshapen, and the artists speckled the building's surfaces with paintings, sundry objects, and a small mosaic. On the tops of rotting ferry slip pilings that extend into the harbor, they planted small gardens on one side and placed welded steel crowns and headdresses on the other. On a crumbling peninsula of pilework and boardwalk, they constructed a wooden dinosaur skeleton virtually camouflaged by the craggy surroundings. A corner cabinet on the second level of the building, was filled with natural curios—skulls, petrified brains, fossils, coral, teeth, and bone fragments. Across from the cabinets a candle-lit chandelier was suspended in front of a tall wall of branches and “leaves” from issues of Le Petit Journal, a Paris publication dedicated to France and Belgium's colonization of Africa. The installation functioned as an exposure of the site, a disclosure of old secrets.

The past is a presence, but getting to it is a rough voyage. Curios, relics, and specimens are the devices with which people keep memories fresh in their minds, but the act of possession inevitably deforms the vision. The delicate preciousness of the installation suggested the fragile, manipulable quality of pastness, as well as the hard fact that what is desired is often gained through oppressive force and foul pretext.

In a final, aggressive gesture, Fleming and LaPointe placed an enormous drawing of the below-deck plan of a 19th-century slave ship on the roof of the Battery Maritime Building. The simple, familiar contours of the vessel entombed a human booty—a freight of men, women, and children acquired and distributed like any other collection. The bold image was most clearly seen from adjacent corporate towers, helicopters, and low-flying planes. If we choose to show off the past—and clearly we do—then the display must include inglorious opportunism as well as fabulous relics.

—Patricia C. Phillips

Martha Fleming and Lync LaPointe, The Wilds and the Deep, 1990, mixed media. Installation view.

sooth. Though speaking from opposite sides of the law, Penhurst/McGarrett and Mason are remarkably utilizing language to manipulate and control their audience.

Manson exploited the flexibility of language, as well as its gravity of meaning, despite his lack of education and social status. The former can be seen in his choice of names—Jesus Christ, the Devil, God, Christ, Devil, Satan, and so on. The latter is exemplified in those moments when he either repeated the language of Power or denied the language of the Other. In the courtroom scene at the end of the performance, Manson rises to say, "I'm going to defend myself one way or another; I'd like the defense to be done now." When this request is preceded by his claim, "I am the Devil," reveals a more confounded agenda.

The Devil, as a figure, is a tricky figure to represent. Look at Manson, Hitler, or Mussolini for that matter, as isolated figures, and they are easily recognizable individuals could never live again. On the other hand, to see them as periodically reborn embodiments of evil, who can be recognized by strange, dark, and often hideous forms and order is to risk a blinding reliance on the very systems such individual tamper with in order to undermine them. The type of questioning required—the type with which Ridge theater so brilliantly challenged their audience—

—Kathy O'Dell

MARTHA FLEMING AND LYNE LAPOINTE
BATTERY MARITIME BUILDING

A repository of vague memories and unrelated activities, the still majestic Battery

Maritime Building not only provides offices for many New York City firms but also serves as a port for the Governor's Island Ferry. It serves as the site for Martha Fleming and Lync LaPointe's month-long installation entitled The Wilds and the Deep.

The Wilds and the Deep is based on the notion that the past is the central theme of the installation in response to the active but deteriorating harbor location. The artists explore history of the harbor location, the artist explores the complex and seldom disseminated process of classification, and the alterability surroundings. A corner cabinet on the second floor of the building is filled with marine shells, pebbles, bird fossils, fossils, coral, teeth, and bone fragments. Across from the cabinets a candle-lit chandelier was suspended in front of a tall wall branches of dried plants. A copy of Le Peintre Africain, a Paris publication dedicated to France and Belgian's colonization of Africa, is on the site, a disclosure of old secrets.

The past is a presence, but past is also a route to the future. Curiously, and specifically are the devices with which people keep memories fresh in their minds, but the act of preservation inevitably deforms the vision. This deformation is evident in The Wilds and the Deep. The artists have suggested the fragile, manipulable quality of pastness, as well as the hard fact that what building with art of size and scale, instead of art made of paper, is a difficult task.

In a final aggregate gesture, Fleming and LaPointe placed an enormous painting of the below-deck plan of a 19th-century slave ship on the roof of the Battery Maritime Building. The simple, familiar contours of the ship were overlaid with a host of figures, a host of men, women, and children acquired and distributed like any other collection. The adjacent corporate towers, helicopters, and tow-flying planes, caused by age and exposure. The building met the sea, and the building was dislocated and misaligned, and the artists speckled the building's surfaces with paintings, sundry objects, and small figures. On the roof of the ferry shipings that extend into the harbor, they planted small gardens on one side and placed walled areas containing trees and shrubs on the other. On a crumpling peninsula of pilings and boardwalk, they constructed a wooden dinosaur skeleton virtually camouflaged by the craggy surroundings. An alternative to "our" museum—a repository of artifacts that correspond to official History—Wilson's installation proposes other ways of seeing, viewing proposed an upside-down world at the center of the exhibition on how you look at it, north can be south; black, white, and the "other," oneself.

Wilson's work is typical of 19th-century colonial museums, recording the white man's triumphs among the natives and the natives' degradation under their civilizations. Groupings of old black-and-white documentary photographs by "Early Ethnographers and Photographers" and "The Slave Trade" are juxtaposed with clusters of images by "Early Black and Native American Photographers." The white men are shown in their various ages—usually naked. Four Brazilian women are shot both from the front and back, wearing nothing but clothes, like lab specimens or criminal mug shots, and without the idealizing regard of the camera. The blacks and Native Americans get behind the camera and shoot themselves, things get more interesting, and darker. Other images show individuals earnestly working at modern tasks such as running sewing machines, working in mines, the schoolhouse, and the like. The schoolhouses, as if to disprove the stereotype of the backward "lazy native." More disturbing are the images of the Brazilian women. These people project themselves back to Europeans as the latter wish to see them: a native dressed in European garb completes the oil painting of a stereotypical village scene, and a young girl in a traditional peasant dress poses before a fake mountain backdrop.

OCTOBER 1990 171

Artforum Inbox

Register to receive our full menu of newsletters—from the Archive, Must See, Video, In Print, Dispatch, and ArtforumEDU—as well as special offers from Artforum.

Studiolo: The Collaborative Work of Martha Fleming & Lyne Lapointe

by Martha Fleming with Lyne Lapointe and Lesley Johnstone

Studiolo is both the title of an installation recently held at the Art Gallery of Windsor and the book form of site projects by two of Canada's top artists, Martha Fleming and Lyne Lapointe. The pair have collaborated for the past 15 years in Montreal, Manhattan, and Sao Paulo. What Fleming and Lapointe do is scout out century-old abandoned buildings, gain permits to access and work in them, and through massive amounts of research and exploration, begin serendipitously to alter the space.

Their interventions do not recontextualize as much as breathe life into decay and ruin. A utilitarian locker room wall, for instance, is rubbed with black shoe polish, anamorphous muses are chalked onto floors, and framed images hang in empty rooms. Their projects take years to realize, and for the few lucky enough to visit them, the experience is not soon forgotten.

Studiolo provides a background, and like their interventions, the reader is held weightless in an undetermined time and place. Fleming, who authored the first half of the book, writes with such eloquence and intelligence it becomes irrelevant that she does not always mention which site she is referring to. She talks of fragmentation, the celestial and terrestrial, dirt and soot, of being lesbian and in love; all of which coagulates brilliantly into a docu-fiction that is partly discursive, partly narrative.

The second half of the book is an interview with the artists by Lesley Johnstone, director of Artextes Editions. The leap from Fleming's elusive cadence to Johnstone's academia and questions about process is startling – like a light switched on in the midst of dreaming. But this section is no less fascinating.

The book's design is reflective of the artists' sensibility, each spread a complete work of art in itself. Half-lit interior images do not read as documentation. Instead, they have the murkiness of camera obscura that match Fleming and Lapointe's subtle and ghostly site interventions.

Lyne Lapointe exhibits The Pregnant Woman

ARTS SUTTON HOSTS THE MULTIDISCIPLINARY ARTIST'S NEW SERIES UNTIL SEPTEMBER 18, 2022

JULY 28, 2022

The exhibition La femme enceinte by multidisciplinary artist Lyne Lapointe, presented at the Arts Sutton art centre, addresses in a metaphorical yet straightforward manner the thorny issue of the pregnant woman's body.

The recent overturning of the Roe vs. Wade decision by the U.S. Supreme Court represents, still today, the overwhelming evidence of the power of a majority of men and of religious dogmatism over women's bodies. The artist establishes a striking parallel between the fate of beaten, missing and killed women and that of animals, so many of whose species are on the verge of extinction.

"The exhibition addresses in a metaphorical yet straightforward manner the thorny issue of the pregnant woman's body."

In the works in the exhibition, Lapointe has taken the iconography of an anatomical plate of the silhouette of a pregnant woman from the book Dr. Hollicks Complete Works – The Marriage Guide published in 1902 in Philadelphia, USA.

The mother-to-be in this guide has no head or feet (ni-queue-ni-head), a stark reminder of how little space women had at the time. Although society has gradually become more egalitarian thanks to the epic struggles of women over the past century, how can we not see in this recent decision of the U.S. Supreme Court a leap backwards by more than fifty years and a dangerous rapprochement with theocracies that flout women's rights?

At the same time, we are witnessing a denial of climate change by a significant portion of the American population and elected officials. The Republican right wing denies the deleterious effects of global warming on wildlife, plants, water resources and people everywhere.

Just recently, this same U.S. Supreme Court drastically limited the powers of the Environmental Protection Agency to regulate carbon dioxide emissions from fossil fuel power plants.

“The artist has imagined a hybrid character, a woman/animal, whose body is that of a pregnant woman and whose “extremities” belong to animals.”

For this exhibition, Lyne Lapointe has imagined a hybrid character, a woman/animal, whose body is that of a pregnant woman and whose “extremities” belong to animals. This is how we discover La femme-héron, La femme-mouton, La femme-beeille, La femme-louve and several others.

The artist offers us, always with sensitivity and irony, heartbreakingly beautiful works of great beauty, through which she invites us to reflect on our disturbing times.

Lyne Lapointe is one of Quebec's leading artists. She began her career in the early 1980s with Martha Fleming. The duo created memorable projects until 1995 in disused spaces, including the Museum of Science (1984) and La Donna Delinquaenta (1987). Fleming & Lapointe, the name of their collective, have also worked elsewhere in Canada, the United States and Latin America.

Since 1995, Lyne Lapointe pursues a prolific solo artistic practice in which she addresses issues that are always relevant, including that of the human body, which, in her eyes, is a political object. She is currently showing work at the Jack Shainman Gallery: The School, Kinderhook, New York, in the group exhibition Stressed World (June 5 – December 3, 2022).

"Lyne Lapointe pursues a prolific solo artistic practice in which she addresses issues that are always relevant, including that of the human body, which, in her eyes, is a political object."

Earlier in the fall of 2021, the Roger Bellemare and Christian Lambert Galleries in Montreal devoted an exhibition to him entitled De la soie aux poils de porc-épic. In La femme enceinte it will also be a question of the body, that of the woman, the pregnant woman, and that of the animals, which still undergo the control of the man.

The idea of the domination of women and animals by man has been rooted since time immemorial. Lyne Lapointe draws a striking parallel between women who have been beaten, disappeared and killed and animals who have suffered an equally harmful fate, many of whose species are endangered.

For this serious and sometimes dark subject, the artist has created singular works of great beauty through which she leads us to reflect further on this state of affairs, with sensitivity and irony.

LA FEMME ENCEINTE, BY LYNE LAPOINTE

Opening on Sunday, July 31, 2022, from 2 to 4 pm

Sylvie Lacerte, curator

Arts Sutton Art Center

7 Academy Street, Sutton QC
450 538-2563

info@artssutton.com

Images from the series La femme enceinte, by Lyne Lapointe
Courtesy of the Arts Sutton Center

The New York Times

Review/Art; Visual Installations Derived From Sound and Poetry

By Roberta Smith

Dec. 15, 1989

About the Archive

This is a digitized version of an article from The Times's print archive, before the start of online publication in 1996. To preserve these articles as they originally appeared, The Times does not alter, edit or update them.

Occasionally the digitization process introduces transcription errors or other problems; we are continuing to work to improve these archived versions.

Whether by chance or design, the two main exhibitions at the New Museum of Contemporary Art in SoHo play off each other in unexpected ways, forming a whole greater than the sum of its parts. These shows say a lot about the present moment in art, especially the quest for new meanings in old materials and images.

Displayed in the large front gallery are six new paintings collectively titled "The Appearance of Sound," by Annette Lemieux, an artist known for her restrained mixings of language with found objects or photographs. These new Lemieux works are large canvases, each printed with a photograph from a bygone era - usually the 1940's - depicting some sort of sound. In each case the image has been suggestively extended with the addition of an object, some scraps of collage or a series of painted letters or words. In "Initial Sounds," for example, a glamorous publicity shot of Edgar Bergen and his dummy Charlie McCarthy is painted over with large capital letters that spell out the basic vowel sounds, the tools of the ventriloquist's magical powers.

In the two back galleries is an elaborate installation piece by Martha Fleming and Lyne Lapointe, two Canadian artists who have worked together since 1983 and who, until now, have executed their site-specific works in abandoned public buildings. This is their first exhibition in a museum.

Titled "Eat Me/Drink Me/Love Me" (the words come from "The Goblin Market," a poem by the 19th-century English poet Christina Rossetti), the installation is approached through an old-fashioned screen door. Once inside, the viewer encounters a portrait of Rossetti paired with one of Emily Dickinson, an odd wood bench with mismatched parts and a series of large, pieced-together collage-drawings. An ambiance of delicately arranged decay pervades; the experience is like stepping into an old house where a slightly deranged naturalist and an unbalanced art historian have been working together, in secret, for years.

All the collage-drawings incorporate old paper, frames and wood paneling, dried flowers and twigs, countless drawings of insects and, on occasion, small dried animals, animal skulls or bones. The work's climax, seen in the museum's final gallery, is an elaborate wood floor that creates a shifting encyclopedic universe underfoot. It is painted with excerpts from a Dickinson poem and images of animals and galaxies, and it is inset with pebbles, fossils and the skeletons of sea creatures.

In many ways these shows could not be more different. Where Ms. Lemieux is stringent and almost puritanical, eking elliptical meanings out of the barest of means, Ms. Fleming and Ms. Lapointe are extravagant, even a little decadent. Where Ms. Lemieux's efforts center on generic photographs suggestive of those produced by the communications industry, Ms. Fleming and Ms. Lapointe present erratic handmade catalogues of the natural world fraught with intimations of Darwinian evolution, Victorian repression and secret passions. But in another sense the two shows are simply different sides of the same coin, for they outline some of the problems inherent in the incessant recycling that is so dominant in today's art.

Neither of these shows is fully satisfactory. In fact, they could be said to leave the viewer between a rock and a hard place. In front of the Fleming-Lapointe works, one wants less sentimentality, less reliance on the seductive look of fatigued, timeworn materials and natural forms. One wants to see a bid for visual originality. For New Yorkers already weary of the macabre neo-Victorian effects of the Starn Twins and sundry other artists, these works may quickly wear thin despite their undeniable beauty.

In one work, a large piece of twisted bark is pinioned to an open frame like a martyred saint. In another, a section of patterned paper that gradually comes to suggest the long gown of a seated woman is topped off with the lower jaw of a primate. Elsewhere, a rendering of Ingres's iconic Turkish bather, her back turned, has been given an enormous rib cage made of real bones. It is connected to a second collage, a drawing of a large wolf that seems about to prey upon her. These are dramatic visual juxtapositions, but they are also steeped in the look of yesteryear and fraught with meanings that remain unclear.

Reading the exhibition's wall text and learning that the Rossetti poem deals with the taboos against female sensuality, one begins to grasp more fully the artists' feminist slant. But this information does little to improve the work's conservative appearance.

In a sense Ms. Lemieux errs in the opposite direction. Her Minimalistic approach seems intended to play down the built-in nostalgia of her images. In front of her pieces, one wants less dryness and discretion, more visual incident, more manipulation of materials. Here, meaning is so easy to get at that it sometimes borders on the obvious.

"Decline," for example, is a large, probably 19th-century image of a thundering waterfall. (Think of Carleton E. Watkins at Yosemite.) On the floor in front of it stretches 12 feet of plush blue carpet - a sound-deadening 20th-century product that stands in stark contrast to the unbridled natural majesty of the towering falls.

Nonetheless, Ms. Lemieux's stronger and more complex works can reverberate in the mind like visual tuning forks. "Stampede," a painting that presents an endless line of uniformed, goose-stepping soldiers' legs, has leaning against it a wooden door that those legs, in times past, might easily have kicked in. On the door in thin, delicate script, Ms. Lemieux lists animal groupings, some of which suddenly sound quite sinister: an army of ants, a deceit of lapwings, a siege of heron, a murder of crows, a crash of rhinoceros. A band of men, a sea of faces are the final entries on the list.

In terms of subject matter, both of these exhibitions are provocative, especially in the way they wrestle with issues of power. Yet on a visual level, both shows force the viewer to ask what was inherent in these bits of memorabilia and trivia and what these artists have added. Too often the answer is, simply, not enough.

"Annette Lemieux: The Appearance of Sound" and "Eat Me/Drink Me/Love Me," an installation by Martha Fleming and Lyne Lapointe, will remain at the New Museum of Contemporary Art, 583 Broadway, near Houston Street, through Feb. 4. David Carrino Tony Shafrazi Gallery 163 Mercer Street Through Dec. 22

David Carrino might be said to operate in the gap between the two New Museum shows reviewed above. His visual sources are mostly 19th-century and English; his treatment of them is Minimalist, even abstract.

For his paintings, Mr. Carrino copies original autograph letters and manuscripts by famous writers. Letters, lecture notes and manuscripts by Mary Shelley, Oscar Wilde, Joseph Conrad and Ralph Waldo Emerson are among those purloined for the paintings in this show. The artist then rewrites these copies at a larger scale, onto pieces of paper that he collages in layers and in different directions (upside down, right side up, sideways) onto canvas.

The results of this bizarre method are a series of pale gray surfaces covered with wafting strokes and largely illegible words that are suggestive of magnified water-stained manuscripts. Mixing signs of the writer's touch with the artist's own, these works question originality while honoring the individual hand. They confirm also the particularity and spirit conveyed by penned script, even in fragmented form, in the days before typewriters and computers. On the debit side, the paintings are visually monotonous, overly refined and infused with a palpable necrophilia - all weaknesses in which Mr. Carrino will find a lot of company in today's art world.

A version of this article appears in print on , Section C, Page 38 of the National edition with the headline: Review/Art; Visual Installations Derived From Sound and Poetry

REVIEWS MONTREAL

Martha Fleming and Lyne Lapointe, La Donna Delinquenta

Corona Theatre

By Francine Dagenais

Lyne Lapointe and Martha Fleming have based their reputation on “excavating” derelict buildings and creating installations from and within them. Their sort of restoration does not aim at erasing the traces of time as much as displaying and exploring them. Each deserted building serves as a metaphor for the abandonment and ghettoization of the neighborhood in which it is located.

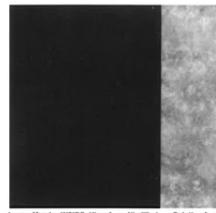

For their latest project they cleared away the accumulation of 20 years of filth and refuse from the interior of the Corona Theatre, revealing a post-Edwardian vaudeville house replete with elaborate moldings, trompe l’oeil decorations, and wreaths of painted flowers peeling from the ceiling. It is in this setting of obsolescence that Fleming and Lapointe created and presented their own theater piece on the discourse of representation, La Donna Delinquenta (The female offender, 1987). (The title is taken from a 19th-century criminology textbook.)

By dressing the walls of their set with figurative “frescoes” (actually large pencil drawings) that included images of women from classical mythology, Renaissance art, and the modern industrial era, they invoked a historical framework for their parable. The theatrical charge was carried not by a traditional narrative but by a discursive, multisensory presentation achieved with a series of scenographic drop curtains (a découpage forest, a fortress, and a drawing of a woman in a prison uniform under the words “I have been abandoned by the world; the title of one of Gustav Mahler’s Rückert Lieder); sound and light effects (rain, thunder, and lightning; Chinese shadows gliding on the stage); and a selection of vocal music (by Offenbach, Verdi, Mahler, and various Depression-era singers such as La Poune and Lydia Mendoza). But the abandoned theater itself remained constantly in the foreground, providing an undercurrent of irony throughout the production.

The dramatization was fragmented, split between silent performers and various “texts” conveyed over loudspeakers by intermediaries (the recorded vocal music, a recited poem). The sung or spoken words were accompanied by (and sometimes contradicted by) the gestures of the performers. Fleming played a traditional outcast figure, dressed in the same prisoner’s costume pictured in the drop curtain. She crisscrossed the stage while the despairing words and music of Mahler’s song (in the original German) echoed throughout the theater, and at the end of the scene climbed willingly into her coffin. This antiheroine personifies the criminal as a manifestation of social strife, which she can only escape through death. Lapointe acted out another recorded lament (a composite of Verdi, Offenbach, etc.), but the action took place in the orchestra pit rather than on the stage, thwarting the audience’s identification with the protagonist. The invisible actress, the exaggerated theatrical effects, the gothic iconography of decay and dissolution—all of these contributed to a Brechtian distancing, a suspension of seduction rather than disbelief.

Like Brecht, Fleming and Lapointe choose oppression as the privileged position from which to view a reality shaped by our dominant ideology. A negative image of our society, seen from the fringe, La Donna Delinquenta questioned our habits of perception, our acceptance of history, and our avid dehumanizing appetite for the new.

—Francine Dagenais

James Morris, INSIDE: View from His Window: Painting for Joseph Nispe, 1987, oil and acrylic on canvas, 8' 6" x 14' 11".

struction of Michel Foucault's famous 1973 essay on Magritte's original painting, or a simple blurring of distinctions between desire, history, politics, and criticism; appropriation and reappropriation. By reducing everything to oblique language systems that slip and slide against each other, French seems to be saying that all interpretation is equally valid.

Because he so obviously delights in rhetorical manipulation, French ultimately comes across as a visual sophist, a Protagonist of representational painting. In his work, hermeneutics has a seat at the table, and math, instead of being solely for intellectual and sensual pleasure. Here, language is shamelessly manipulated to form an endless interplay of revealed and concealed signs, and the audience, riden of its anxieties, can sit back and smile, smiling benignly.

—COLIN GARDNER

James Morris

Saxon-Lee Gallery
James Morris calls his paintings "Amerikaner," or Americans?—and what he calls a "cynically optimistic view in which doubt and reason grapple together, with at least some hope of transcendence." Morris's early combinations of painterly and photographic processes, color cue cards, and the retinal effects of impasto color in much the same way as Gerhard Richter. INSIDE: View from His Window: Painting for Joseph Nispe, 1987, for example, refers to the artist's desire to "see" the interior of his studio in Berlin, where he had been a painter in 1826. Morris has abstracted this stark contrast in dark and light, the shadowy wall of the photographer's studio framing the bright landscape beyond, into a simple diptych. The left half reduces the interior to a brown mottled space, while the right half muddles the exterior into an impressionistic "landscape," a mottled expanse of blues and greens. The photograph has thus been absorbed by the language of painting, then reasserted via the grammar of Morissette's original photograph, enlargement with an accompanying color swatch. Morris seems to be saying that any remaining "aura" left to either painterly or mechanical reproduction is dependent on the intercession of history, language, and process.

and the inevitable elusiveness of representation. The same concerns underlie Morris's later paintings. But for the fact that he has always had a hand in them, they would have been overlooked. Of them, these dark, sometimes indecipherable vistas might conjure up Corot's fuzzy, poeticized landscapes or Caspar David Friedrich's 19th-century Romantic treatises. The landscape, in this case, is not a place of respite or spiritual salve, is relegated to a conceptual role "as propaganda for what things could or should be," as Morris puts it in his artist statement.

Deconstructing the rhetoric of perception, Morris's paintings are composed of painterly cues, color cue cards, and the retinal effects of impasto color in much the same way as Gerhard Richter. INSIDE: View from His Window: Painting for Joseph Nispe, 1987, for example, refers to the artist's desire to "see" the interior of his studio in Berlin, where he had been a painter in 1826. Morris has abstracted this stark contrast in dark and light, the shadowy wall of the photographer's studio framing the bright landscape beyond, into a simple diptych. The left half reduces the interior to a brown mottled space, while the right half muddles the exterior into an impressionistic "landscape," a mottled expanse of blues and greens. The photograph has thus been absorbed by the language of painting, then reasserted via the grammar of Morissette's original photograph, enlargement with an accompanying color swatch. Morris seems to be saying that any remaining "aura" left to either painterly or mechanical reproduction is dependent on the intercession of history, language, and process.

Martha Fleming and Lyne Lapointe, La Donna Delinquente (The female offender), 1987. Performance view showing Martha Fleming.

Such dislocation is further exacerbated by Morris's constant references to popular culture. A deeply used, almost reflexive tendency, it amounts to a game titled Art History—World History (just Like Tom Thumb's Blues), 1987, while a small vignette from the same year, grandiosely named The World as an Image of God, is quickly deflated with the subtitle Like a Rolling Stone. By injecting Bob Dylan's lyrics into the pristine landscape, Morris is delineating all painting as a manifestation of popular culture. Landscape becomes yet one more link in a never-ending chain of literary visual metaphors. It would be inaccurate, however, to dismiss Morris's works as mere deconstructive tools. They assert themselves as autonomous images in their own right, creating the sense of a meaningful and fallen sublime through a highly seductive, sensuous lyricism. Morris's work remains as cynically optimistic as ever.

—CG

Montreal

Marthe Fleming and Lyne Lapointe, Le Donna Delinquente

Corona Theatre
Lyne Lapointe and Marthe Fleming have based their repartition on "excavating" derelict buildings and creating installations from and within them. Their sort of restoration does not aim at erasing the traces of time as much as at displaying and exploring them. Each deserted building serves as a metaphor for the abandonment and ghettoization of the neighborhood in which it is located.

For their latest project, they cleared away the accumulation of 20 years of filth and refuse from the interior of the Corona Theatre, revealing a post-Edwardian vaudeville house replete with elaborate moldings, trompe l'oeil decorations, and wreaths of painted flowers hanging from the ceiling. The setting of obsolescence that Fleming and Lapointe created and presented their own theater piece on the discourse of representation, La Donna Delinquente (The female offender, 1987). (The title is a reference to a 19th-century criminology textbook.)

By dressing the walls of their set with figurative "frescos" (actually large pencil drawings) that included images of women from classical antiquity, Renaissance art, and modern music, the two artists provided a historical framework for their parable. The theatrical charge was carried not by a traditional narrative but by a discursive, multisensory presentation achieved with a series of scenographic drop curtains (a decorative forest scene, a desert scene of a man in a prison uniform under the words "I have been abandoned by the world"; the title of one of Gustav Mahler's Rückert Lieder); sound and light effects (mirrored images of the stage, changing shadows gliding on the stage), and a selection of vocal music (by Offenbach, Verdi, Mahler, and various Depression-era singers such as La Poune and Lydia Mendoza). But the abandoned theater itself remained constantly in the foreground, providing an undercutting of irony throughout the production.

139

Martha Fleming and Lyne Lapointe, La Donna Delinquente (The female offender), 1987.Chérif and Silvie Defraoui, Le Quattro des images (Quattro of images), 1987, mixed media installation view.

Barcelona

Chérif and Silvie Defraoui

Galería Metrópoli
Chérif and Silvie Defraoui, well-known in central Europe for both their artistic and pedagogical work, have long exerted a strong influence on the more radical intellectual circles of Barcelona. Their creative life is characterized by a constant heterodoxy and irony, as well as an eccentric approach free from doctrinaire stylistic restraints. The exhibition/installation here, entitled La Quattro des images (Quattro of images, 1986)—originally presented last year in Toulouse—focused on a celebration of the image, reconsidered and redefined.

Combining a rigorous but playful composition with cartoonlike images, these mixed-media wall-paintings/assemblages explore the relationship between the visible and the invisible, symmetry and imbalance, presence and absence. The Defraouis set up a counterpoint among the works and within each work, through the juxtaposition and superimposition of different kinds of shapes and images. In one painting the whole head of a seated figure is formed by the gallery, with its walls articulated by pilasters into a series of long rectangular panels, by centering each within the frame established by each panel. In addition, the rectangular arcs formed by the arches of columns acted as a set of outer frames.

Several of the works consist only of a gray rectangle, almost 8 feet high and as much as 19 feet long, with a small black square in each corner, painted in acrylic directly on the wall. In other works, this black-cornered gray rectangle serves as the background for a representation of a scene. This can be a real or fictional scene painted on a rectangular shape (with one diagonal side), about 5 feet high, and mounted off-center within the gray rectangle. These recessed scenes from adventure comics that have been altered with new treatments (such as to have figures in the air, a pair of elephants on platforms among a group of dinosaurs) and punctuated by geometric interventions (a cubic grid, random circles). The Defraouis contrast these inscrutable, asymptotically placed scenes with the nearly minimalist planes of the large black squares (and then set up a further contrast between the invariable corner squares and the various checkered patterns).

The gallery space acted as a perspective space, with a rich series of relationships was established through the architecture itself, a clever use of scale, and the development of thematic similarities and oppositions. By using the combination of strategies, the Defraouis were able to create a dialogue—through "rational" mathematical order and through "irrational" evocative pictorial forms. By juxtaposing and integrating these approaches, they try to give new life to our familiar world of images, to propose a new way of perceiving and reading. They encourage us to use different ways of interpreting objects and phenomena in each new encounter, without any permanent referential structures—in effect, to rely on poetic memory.

—GLORIA MOURE

Translated from the Spanish by Horacio Hananah

Rome

Guillaume Bijl

Sala 1

In light of the conspicuous days these days that involve artificial displays and ready-made objects, it would be hardly surprising by the honest craftsmanship of the Belgian artist Guillaume Bijl. He creates installations, which he calls "pièces composées" ("compositions"), to date he has made 26 of them, from the "driving school" installed in the Rue des Rosiers in Antwerp in 1979 to this recent installation of terra-cotta in Rome. These are dramatic constructions that present no theory, idea, concept, image, or vision of the world—that is, no logical or formal discourse—but present situations in which they are unsettling "out-of-place" gods.

If René Magritte's alien spirit and Marcel Broodthaers' love of small signs constitute Bijl's éducation (sentimental), there is also a longer Belgian national tradition, from Jan van Eyck to the clown (the crew of One Hundred and One (the clown of Belgian comics)) that informs his work. Bijl shares their curious interest in motifs and their passion for exactness, and has the same sharp, clear vision for details. In his installations, which often evoke the international tradition of middle-class objects, objects are disposed according to their usual everyday relationships. But Bijl is not in-

Geneviève Cadieux, Landon Mackenzie and Lyne Lapointe

Galerie France Morin

By Martha Fleming

In this exhibition, the evidence that Geneviève Cadieux, Landon Mackenzie, and Lyne Lapointe gave of the community in which they work and show was strong and comprehensive. The cultural specificity of Montreal—a city in relative isolation from the comparatively uniform sheen of what lies west of it in Canada—makes for heady fare.

Of the series of “Illusions” that made up Cadieux’s show, Illusion No. 5 is the most successful. Each “Illusion” consists of a number of large Plexiglas sheets bearing life-size photographic images of a woman in a leotard. Their surfaces abraded and then treated with dark blues and blacks, the panes are placed in a row and adorned with neon rods—some behind them, some in front, and some, as in Illusion No. 5, fastened to their surfaces. Although in all the pieces the slender line between “body as gesture” and “body as carrier of gesture” is inadequately defined, Illusion No. 5 has a cinematic quality which is not dependent on the movement of the photographed body. The still rectitude of the standing figures and of the vertical bars of neon attached to each panel reduces kinesis to a delicate state of implication by situation. Photograph and bar are placed differently in each of the four panels; the similarity and relativity of light and body shimmer against each other in their underlined sequentiality. There’s nothing like potential movement for a close shave with discreet eroticism, and it is this that lets Cadieux off the problematic hook that dangles menacingly between any camera and the female form.

The I’m-not-okay, you’re-not-okay-ness of the other two studies, both of bodies in contortion, is too literal. Unfortunately, states of mind cannot be evidenced by the mere physical presentation of the person undergoing them. Illusion No. 5 is the only work here that manages to evade a reduction to a figure/ground relationship, and consequently it holds together its elements, its images, panels, and lights—elements which in the other pieces are divided and conquered by the loaded representation of the body of a woman.

Landon Mackenzie’s “Lost River Series” of paintings, of a river in northern British Columbia, also follows a sequential pattern. Within the paintings there is affectionate allusion and homage to the kind of earlier Canadian landscape painting that tended to cut off its awe just to spite its realism. Mackenzie’s paintings are not landscapes, however; they are more like mystery plays unfolding on a tundra. The planes of the large dark canvases often seem to include aerial views and horizon lines at the same time. The forms are generalized—animals drinking at water’s edge could be dogs or bears—but their relations are oddly specific: the pool from which they drink becomes a lake when seen in scale with the mountain forms that surround it. There is a topsoilness to the work—things are hidden in the land, hidden in water. The cave-drawing animals, unmanageable beasts, are some of them wounded, some of them trapped, most of them unconscious of being observed, and impossibly human in the animism lent to them by Mackenzie’s representation.

The most outstanding individual work here was a large sculpture, one of the three untitled pieces that comprised Lapointe's exhibition. Three wooden tripods, oversized and culled from some turn-of-the-century land speculator's kit, stand in awesome defense of a tarpaulin which hangs behind them. The tarp is laden with phosphorescent pigment, three thick marks of which are mnemonic of huts, with a gestural curl of smoke emitting from each. These dolmenlike, generalized dwellings appear again as luminescent talismans, one on each of three small slate plaques cradled in the crotches of the looming tripods. The tripods themselves are reminiscent of Viollet Le Duc's speculative drawings of the original human shelter—three trees lashed together at their summit.

The gallery is in darkness; an intermittent and silent light flashes at the foot of the tripods, illuminating the tarp. This light is retained by the phosphorescent pigment, as if the piece were memory itself. The viewer becomes spectator to the specter of the piece as it is veiled and illuminated. The little houses become charms for each other, conspiring to create around the piece itself the atmosphere of the frail and temporary clemency of dwelling and its implied body.

The need for shelter is the fall from grace from the union of mind and body. We are implicated in the piece at the moment of the creation of memory, at the moment of the recognition of mind as separate from body and capable of arresting the continuum to which the body is infinitely vulnerable. Lapointe's sanctuaries name this recognition, bringing us vertiginously to its origin, and it is with tribal memory that we attend each flash of light before the piece.

—Martha Fleming

where they co-exist with real items of 50s decor. In that context their wit and energy might come across with even more force.

—SUSAN C. LARSEN

KAREN CARSON, Rosamund Felsen

Gallery: Carson's recent paintings are extremely memory. Although they look quite different from her earlier work, they almost seem to have been painted from written descriptions of their predecessors. It is as though Carson has named the pieces and then gone back to work on the solid, hard-edged ring of the torso; the fractured planes intersecting the circles, the sparse drawing and loose painting which define the planes and fill them in—act me by, her split-ring space. When these forms had been layered into a stacked, vergingous space, here they are spread out across rectangular canvases both horizontal and vertical; one layer sits from beneath another. Where the previous work was cyclical, the new paintings are all implied polyptychs: laid across the canvas, the circles are arranged in step action, pulled from the perfect round over and over again in arcs, or framed into the lines of painted "frames," as though by physical force. Carson's new paintings narrate and expand across physical space the pictorial space and spin of their predecessors.

Coupled with the paintings' new narrative space is a narrative content. Carson has exchanged the phenomenal for the experiential, and what remains is memory, memory of memory. While the forms of the earlier paintings came close to physical description, or to description of Carson's desire for a physical response, the new pieces are tilted with "circularity" and "spatiality" as memory and is reading. And in the paintings themselves there seems to be a conscious attempt to turn the circle from a shape into a symbol, making obvious its function as a sign of underlying meaning as in the "eye of the lock."

Most of the horizontal paintings are modified diptychs of two framed and tangential circles. At the top of one of the two circles is an eye. Eye in Lock Down is a eye, or its shorthand notation—a heavy black dot topped with a thick horizontal slash. And the circle itself, like the circles in a number of paintings, resembles a cutaway of the eye; a lens is suggested by the overlap of the circle's gray border with the adjacent disc (a loud, broadly striped target) and a retina is formed by an abrupt orange stroke on the bright, polished ground that fills the gray area. The picture echoes its title: the eye, pale and translucent, confronts the painting, the opaque target.

In the vertical paintings circles appear again and below each other as though in time. Here the horizontal bands that frame the overlapping circles don't fall behind them or lie in tangent; instead they are angled, a clear sense of perspective. The low horizon line is framed in broad, echoing strokes which push it deep into the painting and give the view through the eye the roundness of a fish-eye lens.

Also, a monument to the "Spirit of the Land," symbolic of Noguchi's view of the relationship between art and nature—although of a very different kind, remains the problem here. Carson's new works most often is an illustration of the earlier paintings, a reminder of how far she has come, a reaction to their predecessors' formality and historical feel—an attempt to open up, and to allow both artist and viewer greater access. But the Cubism that foiled the earlier painter's desire to make the world a city in relative isolation from the completely uniform sheen of what lies west of it in California—makes for heady fare.

Of series' "illusions" that made Noguchi famous, Illusion No. 5 is the most successful. Each Illusion consists of a number of large Plexiglas sheets bearing life-size photographic images of a woman in a leotard. Their surfaces abraded and then treated with a combination of oil and wax, they are placed in a row and adorned with neon rods—some behind them, some in front and some, as in Illusion No. 5, fastened to their surfaces. Although the woman's body is a boundary between "body as gesture" and "body as carrier of gesture," is inadequately defined. Illusion No. 5 has a cinematic quality which is not dependent on the movement of the figure, but on the movement of the viewer. It is a kinetic object, a kinetic sculpture, it is a kinetic illusion.

Despite the large scale of many of its objects, the artist's concern is with engagement. In demanding attention, the environment requires viewers to read fine presence in it at any given moment, stimulating self-consciousness. It is a shattering of the illusion of the eye, the world. Because of the length and breadth of the work, its proportions shift as one progresses through the space; what was massive up close becomes relatively small at a distance. Even the dehumanizing effect of the vast architectural glass facades is mediated, and they become friendly reflections of the magical garden they enclose. Acting as mirrors, they have the power to reinforce the viewer's self-consciousness. It is contemplation rather than activity that can penetrate to the depths of consciousness. And since Noguchi's work is a metaphor for the state of mind in contact with the world, this state of mind must have provided the artist with a challenge. To the west, the San Diego freeway offers a path to a heading rush of north- and southbound motorists; to the east, a highway that follows the heretic trade of a still-burgeoning Orange County, all around, banks and office buildings team with their legions of white-collar workers. In such an environment, a quiet assertion of human values is a remarkable achievement.

—PETER CLOTHIER

Montreal

GENEVIEVE CADIEUX, LANDON MACKENZIE AND LYNE LAPONTE, Galerie Fréchette

In her exhibition, the evidence that Genevieve Cadieux, Landon Mackenzie, and Lyne Laponte gave of the community in which they work and show was strong and comprehensive. The cultural landscape of Montreal—a city in relative isolation from the completely uniform sheen of what lies west of it in California—makes for heady fare.

Of series' "illusions" that made Noguchi famous, Illusion No. 5 is the most successful. Each Illusion consists of a number of large Plexiglas sheets bearing life-size photographic images of a woman in a leotard. Their surfaces abraded and then treated with a combination of oil and wax, they are placed in a row and adorned with neon rods—some behind them, some in front and some, as in Illusion No. 5, fastened to their surfaces. Although the woman's body is a boundary between "body as gesture" and "body as carrier of gesture," is inadequately defined. Illusion No. 5 has a cinematic quality which is not dependent on the movement of the figure, but on the movement of the viewer. It is a kinetic object, a kinetic sculpture, it is a kinetic illusion.

Despite the large scale of many of its objects, the artist's concern is with engagement. In demanding attention, the environment requires viewers to read fine presence in it at any given moment, stimulating self-consciousness. It is a shattering of the illusion of the eye, the world. Because of the length and breadth of the work, its proportions shift as one progresses through the space; what was massive up close becomes relatively small at a distance. Even the dehumanizing effect of the vast architectural glass facades is each other in their undifferentiated separateness. There's a tension, like a continuous movement, a close shave with discrete eroticism, and it is this that lets Cadeaux off the problematic hook that dangles menacingly between any camera and the female form.

Also, a monument to the "Spirit of the Land," symbolic of Noguchi's view of the relationship between art and nature—although of a very different kind, remains the problem here. Carson's new works most often is an illustration of the earlier paintings, a reminder of how far she has come, a reaction to their predecessors' formality and historical feel—an attempt to open up, and to allow both artist and viewer greater access. But the Cubism that foiled the earlier painter's desire to make the world a city in relative isolation from the completely uniform sheen of what lies west of it in California—makes for heady fare.

Of series' "illusions" that made Noguchi famous, Illusion No. 5 is the most successful. Each Illusion consists of a number of large Plexiglas sheets bearing life-size photographic images of a woman in a leotard. Their surfaces abraded and then treated with a combination of oil and wax, they are placed in a row and adorned with neon rods—some behind them, some in front and some, as in Illusion No. 5, fastened to their surfaces. Although the woman's body is a boundary between "body as gesture" and "body as carrier of gesture," is inadequately defined. Illusion No. 5 has a cinematic quality which is not dependent on the movement of the figure, but on the movement of the viewer. It is a kinetic object, a kinetic sculpture, it is a kinetic illusion.

Despite the large scale of many of its objects, the artist's concern is with engagement. In demanding attention, the environment requires viewers to read fine presence in it at any given moment, stimulating self-consciousness. It is a shattering of the illusion of the eye, the world. Because of the length and breadth of the work, its proportions shift as one progresses through the space; what was massive up close becomes relatively small at a distance. Even the dehumanizing effect of the vast architectural glass facades is diplied in the crotches of the looming tripods. The tripods themselves are reminiscent of Viollet Le Duc's human shelter—three trees lashed together at their summit.

The gallery is in darkness; an intermittent and silent light flashes at the foot of the tripods, illuminating the tarp.

This light is retained by the phosphorescent pigment, as if the piece were memory itself.

The viewer becomes spectator to the specter of the piece as it is veiled and illuminated.

The little houses become charms for each other, conspiring to create around the piece itself the atmosphere of the frail and temporary clemency of dwelling and its implied body.

meaning of these works in words necessarily refers to the subtle subject matter of the paintings and to the sensuous experience of contact with parchment paper.

Pangenberg executes two kinds of work in this material. In one, the paper is left to some extent to speak for itself: the paper cutouts create voice into a silent text that is anyway transparent. The cutouts are circled in pencil, and additional pencilings are added to the paper.

The gallery is in darkness; an intermittent and silent light flashes at the foot of the tripods, illuminating the tarp.

This light is retained by the phosphorescent pigment, as if the piece were memory itself.

The viewer becomes spectator to the specter of the piece as it is veiled and illuminated.

The little houses become charms for each other, conspiring to create around the piece itself the atmosphere of the frail and temporary clemency of dwelling and its implied body.

of impulsiveness and thought—remains an expression of this paradox.

—ANNELIE PÖHLIN

Translated from the German by Martha Humphries

Krefeld

TY TWOMBLY, Haus Lange:

Anyone familiar with the painting of Ty Twombly, an American, will hardly be surprised by the fact that he lives in Europe, or more precisely in Italy. His work not only makes references in terms of content to ancient Mediterranean cultures; it reflects a general attitude toward painting that seems closer to the European than to the American. Twombly's painting, however, caused astonishment when first displayed, in the late 70s, in Naples. He had created these works over a period of years, but it was his ability to manage to evade a reduction to a figure/ground relationship, and consequently to hold together its elements, images, panels, and lights—elements which are usually painted, bounded and congealed by the brush, but here dissolved and merged into a single, flowing, organic whole.

A judgment of works of art, although more provocative, These paintings are defined largely by the delicate texture of the dark background against which the simple, archaic circles—nearly always circular—hold their own.

A judgment of works of art, although more provocative, These paintings are defined largely by the delicate texture of the dark background against which the simple, archaic circles—nearly always circular—hold their own.

As Ty Twombly's paintings are, they are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.

They are composed of what is visible, which is more like mystery than clarity.